

CAME Voice/Voix

A year of the CAME Voice

Rachel Ellaway, VOICE Editor, Rachel.ellaway@ucalgary.ca

Here we are at the end of another academic year and another year for the CAME Voice. Although it seems like it was just yesterday when we started this community blog, the Voice is now 3 years old and we have over this time published more than 100 articles on a diverse range of topics in medical education in Canada, including reviews, announcements, and thought pieces from across the country. Contributors have included professors, deans, students, residents, and many other members of our community. They have shared their ideas and wisdom, let us know about new activities and resources, and they have explored new opportunities and challenges, all in a spirit of collaboration and community building in and around medical education. Not only is this a great community to be a part of at a national level, Canada makes substantial contributions to medical education around the world. Whatever you are doing in and around the 150th anniversary celebrations, do spare a thought for the role the medical education community plays in shaping our national identity, both in terms of what we've done and what we can yet do.

We are now looking forward to our 4th year of the Voice and we would like to extend an open invitation to the Canadian medical education community to submit articles on the things you or others are doing or thinking about that are of interest to the Canadian medical education community. Writing should be in conversational CBC English or Radio Canada French. We edit for flow and house style but other than that you're completely free to tackle any issue or to use any voice you want; creativity is most definitely encouraged.

The Voice will be back for the 2017-2018 academic year in September, we hope you have a great summer!
